Armenian Steppe Linguistic Connections by Mel Copeland

3.02.2020

This is part of a series of documents derived from our work, “Indo-European Table 1,”<sup>1</sup> that places in a spreadsheet format lexemes from Eurasia that link to Indo-European words. Out of the Indo-European Table 1 database I have sorted the lexemes in several contexts, the most important of which is our “Language Connections of Eurasian Pastoralists.” One of the most interesting connections is that of the Armenians who have been an isolated, mountainous group since the Bronze Age. During the Assyrian Empire the Armenians (Urartu) were raided over hundreds of years for being “rebellious,” and they were looted of bronze, copper, gold and silver with each raid by the Assyrian kings. It appears that they may have been one of the centers of metallurgy. They maintained orchards that the Assyrian kings would sometimes have destroyed in the course of their raids. The raids involved cutting roads across the mountains and one such road, or path, was so narrow that was cut along a mountainside, the king complained that he had to get out of his sedan chair and walk. During the Roman era the Armenians expanded their empire and became friends and foes of the Roman Emperors, eventually subdued by Rome.

Since the Armenians were neighbors of the Assyrians and were frequently raided and subdued by the Assyrian kings<sup>2</sup>, we can expect many lexemes in Armenian language to be similar to Akkadian words. Armenians were also captured and enslaved, taken to the Assyrian capital Nineveh, (one captured Armenian king's skin had been posted on the walls of Nineveh; others were skinned and placed on the gate of the Armenian citie(s). In sum, this Assyrian-Armenian period may explain many of the correspondences in this document.

Another thing that seems to be inferred by the data in this document is a close correspondence with steppe languages (Persian, Turkish, Uzbek, Kazakh, Kyrgyz, Mongolian). It may be that the Armenians were steppe tribes before settling in the Caucasus Mountains.

The Demic Diffusion Model

“IV.5.3. R1b-L51 from the west and cultural diffusion

Much more research needs to be done in identifying genetic subclades with reference to the diffusion of Indo-European cultures. Carlos Quilus<sup>3</sup> has offered some considerations that point to a northern Pontic model of diffusion, and its effects on the Beaker population.

West Yamna clans were mainly composed of clans of R1b1a1a2a2-Z2103 lineages, which expanded with Yamna migrants to the west. Subclade R1b1a1a2a1-L51 (and especially R1b1a1a2a1-L151 subclades) may have split after the Neolithic expansion associated with Middle Indo-European, and developed a society in central and south-eastern Europe. It would have later adopted the ‘Yamna package’, developing the East Bell Beaker group that later expanded further to the west. That could be supported by the finding of a R1b1a1a2a2-Z2103 subclade in Vučedol, and by the lack of R1b1a1a2a1-L51 subclades in Yamna. This model could be linked with the proposed origin of Proto-Indo-European in western or central Europe (Cunliffe and Koch 2012). This is in contrast with estimated dates of haplogroup formation, and the inferred history from ancient samples. The evolution of R1b1a1a2-M269 and R1b1a1a2a-L23 lineages within the steppe since the Mesolithic, the quite late TMRCA for R1b1a1a2a-L23, and the finding of an R1b1a1a2a-L23(xZ2013) subclade in eastern Yamna all point to an internal evolution of these subclades. This and the expansion of R1b1a1a2a1-L151 subclades (but not R1b1a1a2a1-L51) with the Bell Beaker culture, probably evolved from Yamna migrants in the westernmost region, makes the eventual appearance of R1b1a1a2a1-L51 subclades in west Yamna quite likely.

IV.5.4. Anatolian hypothesis

An alternative hypothesis is that the Proto-Indo-European homeland was in the Caucasus or Iran, and expanded through Anatolia, which can be linked to the most recent proposals of the Anatolian hypothesis (Renfrew 2003). The current genetic models are not, however, compatible with the Armenian homeland hypothesis (Gamkrelidze and Ivanov 1995), which suggests a more recent expansion of Late Indo-European from the Armenian highland. A westward movement associated with the CHG ancestry may have thus contributed to the dispersal of Anatolian languages, seen in the contribution of CHG to Anatolian peoples during different Neolithic and Chalcolithic waves. The northward mixture of CHG with EHG ancestry in the steppe may signal the formation of Indo-European-speaking steppe population associated with the Chalcolithic expansion of Late Indo-European (Mathieson et al. 2017; Lazaridis et al. 2017). In line with this model, one could support the North Pontic Hypothesis, whereby the Proto-Indo-European homeland should be placed north of the Black Sea, linked to Old European cultures, and in contact with potentially related Uralic and Semitic languages (Vander Linden 2004). However, haplogroup analysis reveals a prevalence of J-M304 lineages associated with CHG expansion into Anatolia, probably related to movements within the Fertile Crescent, which is not seen in the Yamna population. This suggests a different type of spread for this component in the steppe. No archaeological models show such a strong wave of migrants from the south into the steppe, but it shows continuous contacts of steppe cultures with Transcaucasian cultures since the Mesolithic. It is therefore more likely that the CHG contribution came from a long-term inter-regional gene flow that began early, probably coinciding with Neolithic population movements within the steppe.”

The Caucasian Hunter Gather component (CHG) was also seen to move northward to the Danube among fishing communities, then disappeared. Further research on genetic diffusion, of course, will help explain the mysterious intermixing of Armenian with the languages cited in this document. This, of course, is a work in progress.
